If so - in what specific way?

1. Educate teens and young adults about modern contraceptives - emphasizing that each person should decide when she/he is ready to become pregnant and accept responsibility as parent;
2. Promote use of all methods of voluntary, well-informed family planning - including long-term contraceptives and sterilization (vasectomy and tubal ligation) - aware of the complex obstacles to their adoption, particularly the cultural strictures that prevent a woman's free choice of reproductive health services;
3. Communicate the social and personal value of responsible reproductive health choices - including use of social media and other accessible media to reach out to teens and young adults;
4. Support young adults who express an earnest interest in living childfree-for-life - to assure they are well informed of present and future considerations as they contemplate their range of medical options, including all forms of long-term contraceptives and his/her vasectomy/tubal ligation sterilization;
5. Expand awareness of the impact of cultural attitudes and public policies that restrict a broad range of decisions impacting birthrates - including pronatalist pressures to have children, restrictive legislation limiting women's access to abortion, and internationally - child marriage, loss of women's choice to decide whether or when to become pregnant, and the harmful effects of FGM* on young girls;
6. Identify thought leaders - social media influencers, religious and community leaders - who are sympathetic to reproductive health issues and willing to take a public stand with their constituents on a woman's right to decide about child-bearing;
7. Create public awareness of the threat - to ecosystems, wildlife, and endangered species - posed by the loss of natural habitat to accommodate the growing global human populations;
8. Engage with local, state, and national policy-makers to educate about the social and economic strategies for adapting to stable and declining national populations while still maintaining vibrant prosperous economies.
